Investment Case - Updated: November 6, 2022

Werner has been an outperforming transportation stock over the last several years as the company has benefitted from the growth in e-commerce. The increased flow of goods from manufacturer to retailers has led to excess demand for trucks and drivers. The resulting supply imbalance caused prices to rates to rise which has been an overall positive for trucking companies, especially Werner. Werner is differentiated from peers because the company over-indexes to Dedicated customers, which operate on longer-term contracts. This often can result in less volatile earnings profile compared to other trucking companies which take more ad-hoc customers. With the accelerated growth in e-commerce volumes due to the pandemic and lack of new drivers entering the workforce, Werner acquired another short-haul trucking company, ECM Transport, in mid-2021. The company highlighted its low driver turnover and shorter length of haul which is growing in importance as distribution centers move closer to customers.
